How Can I Deal With My Asthma?

Maybe you've been dealing with asthma since you were a little kid, or maybe you've just been diagnosed. Maybe you only wheeze during exercise, or maybe you find it hard to breathe when you're around cats. Whatever the case, asthma can complicate your life and affect you both emotionally and physically.

Because of the restrictions asthma places upon their lives, teens with asthma may feel that they are different from their friends and classmates. For these teens, exercise may be restricted, which could mean shorter practices if they're on a sports team or perhaps no sports participation at all. Medication may also be an issue - some teens would rather not use inhalers, spacers, or peak flow meters (a device that measures air flow from the lungs) in front of their friends. If a teen has asthma that is aggravated by pets such as dogs or cats, he might not be able to visit the homes of friends with those pets.

Teens react in different ways to the complications that asthma brings to their lives. Some stay away from all physical activities, even those approved by their doctors, because they are worried about having a flare. Other teens may find that asthma is a convenient way to get out of chores or gym class. Still others may deny they have asthma at all and may forget or refuse to take preventive asthma medications.

Not following an asthma treatment program can lead to asthma symptoms and flares and can endanger a teen's life. In fact, deaths from asthma among kids and teens have increased in recent years. Although this is partially to the fact that "asthma is becoming more common," says Dr. McGeady, "not taking medications, such as avoiding using an inhaler because their friends will make fun of them, and entering the homes of friends with cats or dogs" are other possible causes contributing to teen deaths from asthma.

So how can you follow your asthma management program and still lead a normal life? Try these
